Some (including online self-titled "encyclopedias" such as Wikipedia) point to San Marino, a parliamentary democratic republic, as having the world's current oldest constitution. Most scholars, however, discount this claim, for it does not have a constitution in a typical traditionally accepted sense but rather six books of statutes written in 1600 that provide hundreds of laws for the operation of the country. Since 1600, the country has gone through some alterations

- of government when it was conquered or absorbed by other nations, but its original law books survived those changes. It thus has the oldest set of surviving laws of any nation in the world, but not the oldest traditional constitution.
